This is the last water mill on the Great Ouse. It is owned and maintained as a working roller mill by the National Trust. The mill produces small quantities of flour which are available in its shop. It was in full production in the 18th century and rebuilt to increase production in the 19th Century. At this time the mill was powered by 3 separate water wheels.

The mill is only open to visitors for a few days a week, so it is best to check on the website for access. The quantities of flour produced are small and products are available on site.

The mill has a range of events each year, including baking days and other interesting days. The flour is milled from soft grained wheat that is sourced from a local farm. It is of good quality and the cold milling process preserves the flavour of the product.
