Lode Mill is in the grounds of Anglesey Abbey near Cambridge. It is owned and worked by the National Trust following a restoration project which was completed in 1982. The original mill was mentioned in the Domesday Book in 1086 and there was probably a mill on this site from a much earlier date. The mill has been used to process coprolites for fertiliser and cement for building in the last century.

The mill is only open to visitors but only mills flour for a few days a week. The quantities of flour produced are small and products are available on site. The main production is whole wheat flour using soft grained wheat varieties from locally sourced farms. They have a good and well tested recipe book.
