Talgarth Mill is a community project which is run by a few part time employed staff and a team of volunteers. It is also established as a bakery and a community cafe. Flour milled on site can be purchased in the mill shop, along with craft items with a Welsh influence. This establishment uses high quality ingredients throughout its range of foods and products and all of the food sold at the café is made on site. This is a popular venue for locals and tourists.

The mill started its life as a corn mill, milling grain for bread and beer making, and animal feed. During the first world war it was used as a fulling mill for making military clothing.

The mill was restored in 2012 and is now working on water power. The water flow is intermittent, depending on the rainfall and river levels, so milling is not done every day. The flour produced is wholemeal and strong wholemeal. It is of a very good quality and is suitable for all kinds of bread making.
